In the early nineteenth century, life for workers was very hard, but a new law in 1824 said that workers could now get together and try to make company owners pay them more money. This had been illegal before. In 1832 a group of six farm workers from the village of Tolpuddle in Dorset formed a 'friendly society' and promised each other that they would not work for less than ten shillings a week. Landowners were only paying seven shillings a week, so the men refused to work. In a small village this meant that the landowners couldn't get all their farm work done.

However, although it was legal for workers to fight for their rights, one landowner discovered that it was illegal to make promises to each other. The landowner wrote to the government and asked for help. The farm workers hadn't known that they were breaking the law but in 1834 they were arrested. They were sent to prison in Australia for seven years.

There were big protests about this. There were marches against the government and 800,000 people signed a letter saying that the men, known as the 'Tolpuddle Martyrs', should be freed. The following year there was a new government. They decided it was wrong for the men to be in prison. Five of the men came back to England after just two years. The sixth man, who had been in prison once before for stealing, was freed one year later.

In 1934, 100 years after the arrest of the men, six cottages were built for retired workers in the village of Tolpuddle. The cottages of the Martyrs themselves are not there any more, but the six cottages were built in a similar style. A library was also built in the village. Today the library is a museum about the Tolpuddle Martyrs and there are streets named after them in London and Australia.
